In the rear of the shop is Joseph McDonaid's coal yard, which is pretty much covered by a wooden one-story frame structure.

Assistant Foreman Reilly and Firemen McGurr and Keily, armed with axea and hose, climbed to the roof of the stable and went to the rear of the building, which was biazing fiercely from end to end.

Reilly began to chop a hole through the roof, when suddenly the rotten timbers fell with a crash.

All three went down amid a shower of smoke and sparks to the coal-pit, about twenty-five feet beneath.

Reilly had to be assisted out by other freemen, but his two mates managed to extricate themselves from the hot debris.
